

About our location – Austin, Texas and the Lost Pines Region

Austin, the capital of the free-spirited state of Texas, is known as a vibrant and diverse city, with a population that enjoys an eclectic, multicultural lifestyle. With a rich musical history and popular live music scene, Austin bills itself as the “Live Music Capital of the World”. To this, add a large collection of art houses and museums, mix in top-notch local restaurants plus a myriad of scenic vistas and recreational opportunities, and you’ve got a city that will entertain you, no matter where your interests lie.

In addition to being an important cultural center, Austin is also known as “Silicon Hills” for the number of high-tech firms that have set up shop in the area. These include Google, Apple, Samsung, IBM, Intel, 3M, and others. With the prestigious University of Texas – Austin located close by, these technology companies benefit from a steady influx of new graduates, helping to fuel this innovative sector.

Just a short distance from Austin proper, you’ll find the Lost Pines Region, known for its wild beauty, numerous parks and recreational opportunities, and historical significance. Step back in time to the mid-1800s as you stroll through beautifully restored Old Town Bastrop, hit the walking trails in the Colorado River Refuge, or enjoy a round of golf on one of the region’s top-notch courses.

Located approximately 160 miles west of Houston and 200 miles south of Dallas-Fort Worth, Austin – and the nearby Lost Pines Region – enjoys a mild and generally dry climate in winter. As a result, many outdoor activities can be enjoyed year-round, from hiking and biking to swimming and golf.

If it seems like Austin and its surrounding area has something for everyone, you’re right! And what’s the best way to experience it all? It’s easy – join us, dive in, and see what this fabulous part of the Lone Star State is all about.
